

Linda Cohen

Stanford Admission Essay

October 30, 2019

Prompt: Tell about your activities or work experience.

I believe that it is a natural obligation of a citizen to participate in public discourse, as it is the only way to improve society and cancel out inequalities on different levels. Thus, I want to attain a degree in political studies to start with myself. I strongly believe in the intersectional approach to change-making and inequality detection. Having grown up in a vibrant and diverse environment, I can see how much an individual's background and its context defines privilege and inequality. Essentially, this is the thought I want to deliver to all people to make our community comfortable for all its representatives, and therefore prosperous and progressive.

There are many things that inspire me. However, I must say my parents are my most significant sources of inspiration. The most important thing I take after them is self-respect, which shows in my interactions with other people rather than in pride. As social studies and politics are a longtime interest of mine, I started participating in related activities in advance. For the last two years, I have been the president of the student government in my school. This experience has given me leadership, management, and decision-making skills. Apart from that, it taught me to handle responsibility not only for myself but for people around me as well. Finally, my student government experience developed my empathy-based communication skills and broadened my knowledge of what challenges people with different backgrounds face in everyday life.

We can always help you write an admission essay for the university of your dream.

Order help

Get free quote

